Mud-slinging down in the Pee Dee

By John Norton

During the past six weeks or so, there's been enough mud slung over in the Sixth Congressional District to start another housing development in the East Cherry Grove tidal flats. Republican hopeful Ed Young is trying to unseat Congressman John W. Jenrette, and he's going for the jugular. Revenge constitutes a portion of Young's motive; Jenrette knocked the freshman Republican out of th sixth district House seat back in 1974 after a very bitter general election campaign. And Young won his seat for the first time in 1972 by executing political coup, defeating Jenrette in the general election after Jenrette managed to unseat seventeen-term Congressman John D. McMillan in a free-for-all Democratic primary.

Jenrette has spent the last two years in Washington working his way into the Congressional power structure. But now Young is back on the warpath. He and/or his staff recently leaked information on Jenrette's financial dealings to the Charlotte Observer and in the wake of an Observer investigative report, a federal grand jury has been instructed to investigate Jenrette.

Even in South Carolina's Sixth Congressional District, where "dirty politics" is a nice word for it, Johnny Jenrette has had a tough way to go.

Pee Dee politics is strange brew. The Sixth District is the home of former state senator Ralph Gasque, now under indictment for misuse of federal housing and manpower funds. The Pee Dee also harbors former Horry County senator James Stevens, a longtime legislative power broker, who punched out a primary opponent at a stump meeting last spring and was subsequently charged with assault. Another Stevens opponent in that recent primary was Ralph Ellis, who ran on a platform decrying special interest and the amount of power which has accumulated in the hands of Stevens and other senior members of the Senate. When Stevens realized during the primary that Ellis was scoring enough points to beat him, Stevens, attempted an incredible flip-flop, issuing a statement that he too was against special interests and would, if reelected, dedicate himself to the destruction of the seniority system in the state legislature. Ellis took every county in the district.

Johnny Jenrette learned Pee Dee politics at Stevens' knee. Stevens still had a firm grip on the Horry Democratic machine back in the sixties, and with Stevens' help Jenrette was elected to a seat in the state House of Representatives where he served three terms. But Jenrette had his eye on bigger targets. John McMillan was an institution in the Sixth District and the local talk was that he would serve until he received a mandate from heaven. Jenrette, however, figured correctly that Pee Dee voters were ready for a fresh face. He announced his candidacy in the fall of 1971; in August of 1972 he ran second in a three-way primary race, forcing McMillan into a run-off, then beat the veteran Congressman one-on-one.

After edging out McMillan in the September runoff, Jenrette looked like a good bet to come out on top in the general elections as well. He faced Republican Ed Young, a Florence farmer and radio personality, in the general election. It was Young's first time out and while he maintained an above-the-fray public stance, behind the scenes the mud was flying. Some Young supporters passed out newspaper clippings which attempted to link Jenrette with a "hippie rock music park" which flourished briefly at Myrtle Beach in the

Electoral Explosives

If Jerry Ford piles up four million votes in New York when the ballots are opened next month and if Jimmy Carter gets four million votes plus one, Jimmy Carter gets all 41 electoral votes. This time - honored winner-take-all system is what makes close elections such breath-taking sporting events in America.

"The electoral college method of electing a President of the United States is archaic, undemocratic, complex, ambiguous, indirect and dangerous," reported a blue-ribbon commission of the American Bar Association in 1967. So what? Nothing was done. We all love excitement and it's titillating to live on a minefield. Whether or not to abolish the Electoral College has been the longest - standing debate in American political science

Most polls indicate a close race; Jerry has been closing in on Jimmy, aided by the Playboy affair, and there's a sense in Washington that anything can happen; neither candidate thrills the voters; there are no "jumpers" or "squealers," as we in the press bus used to call the excited women along the way when Jack Kennedy's motorcade went through; and they don't roll in the aisles when Mr. Ford makes one of his earnest near-beer speeches — as FDR made the Teamsters do in his overwhelming Little Dog Fala speech so long ago. No, there's a kind of bored sobriety about it all, and a patient feeling that it'll all be over soon, anyway.

So people are studying the rules of the game compiled in the Philadelphia 1787 constitutional rule book. The goal, then, was to keep the presidential selection process away from the public (you and me); Roger Sherman said that the people "should have as little to do as may be about the government. They want information and are constantly liable to be misled." They invented a cozy Electoral College of the best minds which would pick a proper President though most people today still think they are voting directly for Carter and Ford and not for faceless electors. A candidate needs 270 electors to win. A lot of things flow out of the system including, probably, the depature of Earl Butz last week. Mr. Ford must have been reading about the Reverend Samuel D. Burchard.

Did an ethnic slur ever decide a presidential election? You bet it did, with the aid of the Electoral College. The year was 1884, the candidates were Cleveland and Blaine and Earl Butz's graceless predecessor was a Presbyterian minister. It was a close race; New York State would probably decide it; New York City would decide the state and an angry ethnic or religious group could probably decide the city. Could and did.

At a meeting of Protestant ministers for Republican Blaine, Burchard welcomed the candidate and got his name in the and got his name in the books by charging that Democrats and Rebellion." It was as alliterative as a Spiro Agnew speech. Blaine, of Irish descent himself, didn't hear the remark or let it go unrebuked, and his Celtic supporters turned on him passionately. Result: Cleveland carried New York by 1149 votes out of a million; won New York's winner-take-all 36 electors and got the presidency — 219 electors to 182 for Blaine. Fun, eh? And a thing like that in a close contest could happen in 1976.

You can't help feeling sorry for Butz. He's a man with a Rotarian style of oratory and behind-the-barn humor, betrayed by the tittle-tattle of a private conversation aboard an airplane after the Kansas City convention by sharp-eared John W. Dean, III. Dean was Nixon's counsel, the informer with the choirboy look who first egged Nixon on and later pulled the plug on Watergate. John Dean is a character out of Shakespeare; there'll always be one of him around in great drama, always sliding through, always telling all — for a fee — always landing on his feet.

Unlike the Burchard crack Butz's nasty slur is unprintable and attacks the whole black race. After it got out, Butz had to go. There are 15.4 million blacks of voting age in the US making up 46 percent of the population of Chicago, for example. Illinois (26 electoral votes) leans to Ford. Black turnout in big cities is low but no party could shoulder a thing like that.

As to the Electoral College it, should, of course, be removed like that other constitutional anachronism, the vice presidency, with direct popular voting substituted. In 1969 the House approved a constitutional amendment to end the anomaly, 339 to 70, but it got tangled up in a Senate filibuster and lost.

The College has caused some near misses. In 1968 a shift of 42,000 votes would have thrown the election into the House which was what George Wallace (who got 46 electoral votes) was trying to do: he told a reporter that he hoped to be the balance of power between Nixon and Humphrey and extort from one of them, as the price of his deciding votes, a voice in picking Supreme Court Justices. Some day, when nobody gets the requisite majority from the Faceless Men in the College, the stick of dynamite in the Constitution will go off and the election will go into the House of Representatives. It is doubtful that we will do anything to meet the situation before then.

Mayaguez Memory

President Ford's Gallup poll rating leaped after the Mayaguez incident. It jumped 11 percent in the sharpest gain since Nixon's 17-point leap after the Vietnam "peace" settlement in January 1973. The only trouble was, of course, that Marines were ordered to rescue the American merchantman's 39-man crew after receiving word that they were already off the island, and at a cost of 41 lives. Release of the General Accounting Office's dry recapitulation of the incident by a House committee now is doubtless a political act. But it must be remembered that Ford boasted about Mayaguez in Indiana, April 23, 1976. He told an audience, "I think the Mayaguez incident ought to be a fair warning to any country of the decisivethe Ford administration." He told the nation that he had constitutional authority for the action. "I was not consulted," said Mike Mansfield.

How good is the Ford judgment in such matters? He and five other congressional hawks were briefed on Nixon's secret, undeclared bombing of Cambodia in 1969. Nixon lied to the public that he was respecting Cambodia's neutrality. Mr. Ford did not speak.

Here's a PCB-Sangamo update:

On Oct. 17, the Sangamo Electric Company of Pickens met with Environmental Protection Agency officials in Atlanta and reached a "compromise" agreement in which Sangamo agreed to drop a U. S. district court suit filed Oct. 4 against EPA and received in return a one-year grace period in which to completely eliminate the suspected carcinogen polychlorinated biphenyl from its wastewater discharge.

High PCB levels in Lake Hartwell water and fish samples have been traced to discharges from the Sangamo plant. EPA and the State Department of Health and Environmental Control warned fishermen on August 13 not to eat fish taken from the 60,000-acre lake which lies between Georgia and South Carolina.

In its suit against EPA, Sangamo charged that the federal agency had "abused its discretion" and "disregarded administrative procedures" in ordering the company to meet standards of which they were not informed. Several environmentalists familiar with the Sangamo situation have told Osceola that EPA botched its enforcement responsibility in regard to Sangamo, and several suggested that EPA made a liberal settlement with the electric company to avoid potentially embarrassing publicity which might emerge if the suit was litiguated.

Under an EPA directive issued in late August, Sangamo was to have reduced PCB levels in its discharge to below one part per billion by Oct. 2. This deadline was later waived and remained that way until the agreement was reached last week. In addition to the zero discharge level required by Nov. 1, 1977, Sangamo will be required to reduce its PCB output to roughly 1.8 ppb by April 1, 1977.

(The two-year ban on use of PCBs, signed into law last week by President Ford, applies to manufacturing processes and will, of course, include Sangamo. The one-year grace period granted by EPA relates to the company's discharge of PCB in its wastewater effluent. Sangamo claims that the PCB is not coming from its manufacturing process where it is now diverted into sealed barrels and stripped off for incineration. The carcinogen apparently contaminated the piping system and the wastewater treatment system when it was still being disposed of through those systems and those systems are now contaminating otherwise PCB-free water. Presumably, Sangamo will have to remove all sources of contamination by November, 1977.)

On Oct. 10, EPA regional administrator Jack Ravan, in response to criticism of the liberal terms of the Sangamo settlement, issued a statement indicating that EPA was still "strongly" considering enforcement action against Sangamo for past offenses. "They have not been excused by us," Ravan said. The company could be fined substantially for previous PCB discharges, provided EPA can prove that company was violating established the standards. Thus far, EPA has not been able to offer definitive proof of a violation and the on-record correspondence between Sangamo and EPA substantiates a Sangamo claim that EPA showed little or no interest in their PCB discharge until recently. (See Osceola, Oct. 8)

Will EPA actually take enforcement action against Sangamo for past sins and risk dragging skeletons from its own bureaucratic closet? It seems doubtful. Let's wait and see.

More on Rocky's finger

Friends at the Anderson Independent were miffed when we left them out of a recent story which examined the handling of the Nelson Rockerfeller "bird" photo by various dailies circulated in South Carolina. Writer Brad Stinson questioned editors at the morning and afternoon papers in Charleston, Greenville, and Columbia, as well as editor David Lawrence of the Charlotte Observer. Stinson discovered

An announcement...

Anyone familiar with Osceola probably realizes that we've had some typographical, printing and business spasms over the past several months.

The story behind all of that is a long, complicated one, and we are not going to belabor it here. But we are pleased to announce that this issue (our 172nd) marks the first in our history we've published with the full input of The Camden Company.

The Camden Company is a newspaper management group headed by Camden businessman Fred Sheheen, and Parallax Media Projects, Inc. (Osceola's corporate structure) has assigned by contract all business, advertising and circulation functions of the newspaper to The Camden Company.

This has been done for several reasons, primarily because we determined that an outside group specializing in the functions described above would be able to do them far more efficiently than was the case previously. Many of the business functions of the newspaper over the past three years were handled by volunteers and by staff writers, who were also responsible for the editorial operation of the newspaper—that is, writing the stories. Time—or lack of it—became critical, and so we sought relief.

Things were held up for awhile because of complications, but everything appears to be settled now. We anticipate much more time for staff members to research stories, and hope that a better newspaper is the result.

The Camden Company has named a new advertising manager, Sam Dixon, the first full-time person we've had on the job in a number of months.

Staff writer John Norton, one of the original founders of Osceola, has rejoined the staff after two years back in academia. He has already turned out two pieces since his return—last week's story on PCBs in Lake Hartwell and this week's on the Sixth District congressional campaign. We anticipate many similar efforts in the future.

Venson Steadman will also be part of the full-time staff, concentrating on stories about the arts in South Carolina, as well as on film and theatre reviews and editing the events section.

We hope that this new structure will be a successful one for the staff and for readers. We have lofty goals for Osceola, and we think this is a step in the right direction.

that of the four morning papers surveyed, only one — the Observer — ran the photo of Rockerfeller gesturing with his middle finger at a crowd of New York state college students. Two afternoon papers — the Columbia Record and the Greenville Piedmont — published the candid photo of the vice-president, although the Record pulled the photo after its first edition.

The Independent and its p.m. counterpart, the Daily Mail were not included in the survey. "I tried to stick to major state dailies," Stinson quipped this week. Now we learn from Independent staffers that the Rockerfeller photo appeared on page 3-A of the morning Independent's South Carolina and Georgia editions, which has the larger circulation of the jointly-owned morning and afternoon papers. The photo did not appear in the Daily Mail.

The Independent-Daily Mail, by the way, was stocked several years ago with a number of newly-spawned graduates from the University of Missouri school of journalism. Pagewise, the papers are too small to compete quantitatively with the dailies of Greenville, Columbia, and Charleston. Both the Independent and Daily Mail, however, have writers of above-average quality on the payroll — Randy Smith and Darrell Hoemann among them. If management can hang on to the talent and plump up the budget, eventually the papers may be in a position to back up the slogan which appears in the Independent masthead: "South Carolina's Best Newspaper."

Lousy, biased, and worthless news

October 13, 1976
Paralax [sic] Media Projects, Inc.
P. O. Box 5033
Columbia, South Carolina 29250

Gentlemen:

Your article on Chip Carter's visit to Columbia was as your caption indicated, a "Cheap Shot", You have placed, what many people in your city think of as an enlightened paper, in the same category as the other sub-mediocre news media of this State.

If it were not for the fact that your paper was given exclusive interview time and an opportunity to travel the full day with Carter, you could probably be excused for such a biased and unobjective article. Your article on two occasions misquoted Carter and never did you mention his answers to the few complex issue questions that you asked (the news conference was a farce — nine out of ten questions delt [sic] with Playboy).

Thanks for the cheap shot and your paper will now be one less that this campaign worker will spend for lousy, biased and worthless news.

Sincerely,

Apartment hunting

I sit tonight listening to Brahms upon the stereo and to the steady hiss of oakwood burning its low flame in the fireplace. The handsome little cottage I've just moved into, deep in the woods of Dentsville, costs me a grand total of $135 a month in rent. It's a delight, with a spacious, clean kitchen, an almost luxurious bathroom, and a large quiet bedroom. Deep in the woods as it is, the house is a resevoir of peacefulness, save for the songs of the birds.

Yet I could as easily have been staying the night in a stuffy duplex south of Rosewood Drive, where the television set of the couple next door broadcasts its thumping drone through the duplex's common wall. That apartment would have cost $125. Or I could have taken a small house in the same area—small and filthy and run down, for $165. Or, there were others, other apartments, other homes, I saw and considered and came dangerously close to laying money down on. And if I sit gloating tonight, I can congratulate myself for a small measure of persistence and a large measure of luck.

The real estate market, whether by design or happenstance, works to the distinct disadvantage of the consumer. The basic problem is what economists call "information costs." For example, suppose you're looking for a place to live. You find an interesting classified ad in the newspaper, and make a telephone call to see if you can look at the place. Since it's now Fall and most university people have settled in, chances are good that the place hasn't already been rented by the time you've called. Well then, you go to see it. Your tour is brief and quick (the landlord avers that three other callers are on their way). All you can see is an overview of the apartment's layout. There's no time for the eye to catch the small details—the poorly-concealed four-foot hole in the wall, or perhaps a stove with three out of four burners beyond repair. Nor is there time to discover whether the apartment comes furnished with free (and unrequested) Top 40 concerts every night from the ear-splitting stereo of those beer-drinking used car salesmen upstairs. (It seems that if somebody's going to invade one's privacy with music distilled through thin walls till it's just intelligible, at least the person should have the plain decency to play tasteful music, some vintage Bowie or Lonnie Liston Smith or even Bach. But no, the ones with the loudest stereos are always favoring the rest of the world with the likes of such crud as the Carpenters or maybe a blast from the past such as Roy Orbison singing "Only the Lonely." It's enough to make one puke all over his Garrard.)

> "...Will you take the apartment? The landlord's palms are getting itchy for the feel of dirty greenbacks. The pressure is on, and you have to make a fast decision, out of pure ignorance..."

But then comes the moment of truth. Will you take the apartment? The landlord's palms are getting itchy for the feel of dirty greenbacks. The pressure is on, and you have to make a fast decision, out of pure ignorance. First, you don't really know all about the place. How could you in so short a time? Then you haven't any accurate idea of how many superior apartments are available at that moment, much less the ones that will soon come onto the market. After that, you don't know how many other apartments of the same calibre as the one you're checking are immediately available at a lower price.

In economic terms, you ar kept ignorant of supply and demand conditions in the real estate market. There could be an oversupply in the market, and hence the apartment you're looking at could be priced too high, but how to know for sure? The landlord most likely knows what the market is, because he's been offering his apartment for rent, and he has his responses to gauge. But all you have to go by is a glance at the classified ads, which are at best a poor guide. On any given day, the number of real estate ads remains fairly constant. They give no real clue to whether oversupply or excess demand prevails. Thus most people assume the market for rented apartments and homes is always feeling excess demand—too many people looking for too few places. But this is not always the case. For instance, it's said that one must look for a place to live in the late summer, well before the university students and professors return for the Fall. After summer, according to this wisdom, all the good apartments and homes have been taken, and nothing interesting will be available for the rest of the year. But to the contrary, I myself found that looking in the fall, after university people had left the market, was very satisfactory. In fact, there existed a relative oversupply of homes for rent, and some good ones could be had for as little as $125 a month. Not a few landlords were getting panicky over the prospect of going much longer without a tenant.

But it's much in the landlord's interest for you the consumer to think a condition of over-demand exists. Then you'll rush to sign any lease you're offered, and you'll pay inflated rents on the supposition that you were lucky to find the dump at all. For your ignorance is the very source of any landlord's advantage. It's the lever by which he applies selling pressure on you.

What can the consumer do, after all? The search for a place to live requires a tremendous expense. One must be prepared to spend many hours of time combing classified ads, making calls, dridriving through myriad neighborhoods, listening to sales pitches that range from slightly euphemistic to downright deceitful. Only after weeks of such tedium will you be able to have any sort of feel for the current market. But even those insights gained are only marginally helpful. If they perhaps insure that you won't pay a rent too far above the range you've seen offered, they tell you nothing of the apartment or home that might come on the market tomorrow, or of what the summer of 1971. Jenrette's brother-in-law, a Charlotte promoter named Randall Sproles, began operation of the park—called the "Sanctuary"—during Easter, with plans to stage a rock concert. In May, the Sanctuary was converted to a campground for youthful transients who could crash overnight for fifty cents and who could use the Sanctuary as an address if picked up by police on suspicion of vagrancy. Myrtle Beach police quickly labelled the campground a "drug haven" and Police Chief W. C. Newton told reporters that much of the drug traffic in the beach area was being channeled through the Sanctuary.

Shortly after the park was established, Jenrette's name became linked with its operation. Jenrette, who was then campaigning against McMillan, denied any personal connection with the enterprise, stating that his only contact came when he performed some legal work for his brother-in-law. The campground was closed in August after a cadre of SLED agents arrested four youths on the premises and charged them with possession for sale of LSD and marijuana. Jenrette told the Myrtle Beach Sun-News in August that he had sent a number of "hippie-looking types" to the campground to determine if drugs were being used or sold. The state representative said he then contacted SLED chief Pete Strom who sent agents into the park. Strom affirmed Jenrette's account and the park story faded into the background until October when Young supporters revived it, charging that Jenrette had had a personal financial interest in the Sanctuary and that a beer license for the operation had been obtained by Jenrette even though his brother-in-law was not eligible for one, due to state residency requirements. When the state Alcohol Beverage Control Board could turn up no records of a beer license issued to anyone for the campground, Young supporters pointed to a cover-up. But no one was ever able to back up that charge, and the clippings and charges have faded over the intervening years.

Another charge leveled at Jenrette during the 1972 campaign has proven far more virulent, returning this political year with such ferocity that the Congressman's chances of surviving another term are seriously threatened.

The charges sprang out of rumors during the McMillan run-off that Jenrette had acquired state-owned beach property for one dollar in 1969. The property in question was tidal land in Cherry Grove Beach—land which was later to become Heritage Shores, the development which has recently come under investigation by federal grand jury after the Charlotte Observer revealed that Jenrette, as principal owner, had been involved in questionable financial activities related to Heritage Shores.

In fact, Jenrette had not personally acquired the property for one dollar. The property was involved in a dispute between the state and the East Cherry Grove Realty Company which was settled in 1969. The realty company claimed title to land which the state held was public property since it fell below the high-water mark in the Cherry Grove marsh. The dispute was settled when the state and the realty company exchanged parcels of land and "the sum of one dollar." The transaction was completed on Dec. 17, 1969. On Dec. 30, 1969, a portion of the land which the realty company received in settlement was sold to Heritage Shores, Ltd. for $120,000.

Young supporters raised the issue of the land in October 1972, when a flood of letters were mailed to Pee Dee newspapers. On Oct. 17, Jenrette issued a statement to the press declaring that he had in no way been involved in the land transaction between the state and the realty company. Furthermore, he declared that he was not a principal owner in Heritage Shores. He told reporters he had received "a minor share of stock" in the corporation "well after the court case was settled," in return for some legal work he did for the company. On Oct. 19, Attorney General Dan McLeod backed up Jenrette's statements, explaining the nature of the land exchange and adding that "there are no records" in the Secretary of State's office "concerning stockholders" in Heritage Shores. Osceola reporters went to the Secretary of State's office on Oct. 20 and obtained certified copies of documents showing that Jenrette owned 36.36 percent of the Heritage Shores stock, that his secretary owned 9.09 percent and that his cousin, John P. Moore of Nichols, owned the remaining 54.55 percent. (Moore later died and Jenrette obtained his share, making his total holdings over 90 percent.) It was apparent from the facts gathered by Osceola that Jenrette had lied about his involvement in Heritage Shores. Thirty-six percent could hardly be called a "minor share" of stock. And in claiming that he received his minor share long after the state realty company transaction was completed, Jenrette completely subverted the truth. He had incorporated Heritage Shores on Dec. 15, 1969, the land transaction was completed on Dec. 17 and the land newly - acquired by East Cherry Grove Realty was sold to Jenrette's corporation on Dec. 30.

Jenrette lost to Young in November in a fairly close election. It is doubtful if the Sanctuary episode had much if any efect on the outcome. The Heritage Shores issue, particularly the "bought land for $1" charges, may have cost Jenrette a small portion of the vote, but Jenrette's denial, based in fact and supported by the attorney general, was effective. The more significant issue, that Jenrette was hiding his involvement in Heritage Shores, was raised only in Osceola and received attention in the daily press. (The question of why Jenrette felt it necessary to hide his involvement in a then seemingly legitimate enterprise has never been answered satisfactorily).

In the summer of 1974, John Jenrette beat out a field of contenders in the 1974 Democratic primaries and once again found himself facing Ed Young. But this time Jenrette was campaigning against an incumbent with a record to which he could be held accountable. Young had encumbered himself with a shaky farm vote in a heavily agricultural district and Jenrette played it for all it was worth. And Young was a Republican, campaigning in the wake of the Nixon resignation in August. Young's claim of access to the President during the '72 campaign had become a liability in '74.

It was Pee Dee politics as usual — low-down and mean — and Jenrette had to duck his share of mud. The ghost of Heritage Shores made an appearance, but Jenrette dodged it, claiming the issue was old ground which had been covered two years before. The would-be Congressman had a little more trouble fielding charges from Young supporters that he had welched on his income tax returns in 1971 and 1973 to the tune of $14,913.99. Jenrette claimed there was "nothing illegal" about his returns and claimed the IRS audits were initiated because he was on "an enemy list" — a popular Democratic ploy in 1974.

Young, deservedly or undeservedly, became a victim of the Watergate backlash and Jenrette was narrowly elected to his first term. Arriving in Washington, the new Sixth District Congressman quickly found his place in the Congressional organization, landing a job as a deputy Democratic whip, shepherding 75 fellow freshmen.

After his election, Jenrette's problems seemed to multiply. In December, 1974, a cousin, Robert F. Herring, Jr., filed suit against him, charging that he had illegally diverted $15,000 in revenues from a jointly - owned business in Aiken. Jenrette countersued, seeking damages from Herring for alledgedly failing to live up to the terms in a sales agreement and an accompanying legal promise not to sue. The suits were settled quietly out of court in May, 1976, according to the Horry county clerk of court's office.

Early in the new year, Jenrette's wife Sally filed for a divorce. According to sources familiar with the situation, the Jenrettes had agreed to a quiet Dominican Republic divorce in which Mrs. Jenrette would fly to the Republic in February, 1975 and carry out the necessary procedures. For some reason, the sources say, Jenrette reneged on the agreement and "had papers served on her charging her with insanity, child abuse and negligence." At that point, Jenrette's wife determined that their agreement had been breached and filed suit for divorce charging the Congressman with drunkenness and adultery.

Mrs. Jenrette was involved in a related incident during this period which emerged some months later in the press. In September of 1974, the Horry County legislative delegation, headed by Senator James Stevens, supported Sally Jenrette for a post on the South Carolina Board of Education to fill out a term which would expire on Jan. 1, 1975. According to Mrs. Jenrette, it was understood that she would serve a full four-year term, and she did not discover that her appointment would not be renewed until she was informed of the fact by her husband in January, after they had separated. Mrs. Jenrette, who sources say had considered separation before the election and had remained with her husband to avoid harming him politically, would probably have been reappointed had she remained with him after the election. She told a Myrtle Beach reporter that Senator Stevens had asked her to serve a four-year term when he spoke with her in the early fall. (Stevens later represented Jenrette during a child support hearing in Conway.)

The couple received a divorce in the Dominican Republic in June, 1975. Although there was much speculation at the time that the divorce would hurt Jenrette politically, the issue has subsided somewhat recently following a campaign contribution from the Congressman's former wife last spring, much publicized by Jenrette, and Jenrette's recent marriage to Rita Carpenter, a former research director for the Republican National Committee. (In October, 1975 Carpenter was forced out of her job with the Republican Task Force set up to work against vulnerable Democratic incumbents, a group which included Jenrette, when it was discovered that she and Jenrette were dating.)

In June, 1975 Jenrette became embroiled in another controversy when it was learned that he had accepted a 1974 political contribution from a Lake city federal contractor, a violation of campaign laws. In September, 1975, U. S. District Attorney Mark Buyck announced that the FBI would check into Jenrette's campaign reports.

Kicking off the 1976 campaign early, Jenrette organized a two-day "national business conference" in Washington during October of 1975 which was attended by more than 100 businessmen from the Sixth District. Jenrette's constituents heard their Congressman praised by the likes of House Speaker Carl Albert and House Majority Leader Tip O'Neill Jr. A number of Republicans also appeared at the conference, mostly in their capacities as cabinet officers and agency heads. One of the more interesting speakers was Pulitzer Prize winning reporter James Polk, noted for his exposes of illegal campaign contributions.

Two weeks later Jenrette played host to Carl Albert at home when the Speaker attended a $100 a plate fundraiser for the congressman. At that time, Jenrette told reporters that Albert was helping raise funds to pay off Jenrette's '74 campaign debts, but added that he would probably avoid inviting other Congressional heavies to campaign for him in '76. Jenrette's air was confident, but the candidate was running scared. A messy divorce and reports of campaign contribution violations had increased the Congressman's vulnerability, and by the start-up of the '76 primary campaign he was given no better than an even chance of overcoming his Democratic opponents.

The two heavyweight contenders in that primary battle were Bill Craig, who had run Jenrette a good race in two previous elections, and Florence mayor Cooper Tedder, a "large, likeable" fellow who in 1970 had knocked off David McCleod, mayor of Florence for 16 years. Tedder was not well known throughout the Sixth District and he would have to mount a strong campaign to get his name and face before the voters. He didn't. "Tedder fumbled," says one Demo party regular. "It was a textbook case of how not to run a campaign against an incumbent." Bill Craig had done pretty well in two previous races, but he was unable to interest much of the electorate in his third candidacy. Jenrette won by impressive margins; he had overcome the stigma of divorce and the rumors of unethical conduct by running on a solid Congressional record attractive to the Pee Dee's rural voters. With the scandal behind him and his momentum high, Jenrette looked like a sure bet to take Young in the general election and return to Congress.

The question today, in these final weeks before the November election, is whether the Jenrette momentum will be enough to carry him through his most recent scandal, which surrounded him in October when the Charlotte Observer, acting on tips provided by the Young campaign, published an investigative article tying Jenrette to shady land dealings at his old nemesis — Heritage Shores.

Young has run an essentially negative campaign, based more on mud-slinging than on issues. In August Young began hurling barbs, charging that Jenrette was the bought-off boy of special interest groups. Young pointed to $20,000 in campaign gifts which Jenrette, a member of the House Agriculture Committee, received from midwestern milk interests after Jenrette cast three pro-milk lobby votes in Congress. Young has also harped on contributions to the Jenrette campaign by a dozen or more national labor organizations. "He is the candidate of special interest groups," Young said. Jenrette has responded that Young has no platform, that he is unwilling to elevate the campaign to a level where positions on serious issues would become the major points of contention. "He avoids the issues because of his mediocre record in Congress," Jenrette said recently.

Before the Heritage Shores issue reemerged, most observers beleived Jenrette would beat Young hands down. Pee Dee voters have tired of mudslinging, the argument goes, and Jenrette has a solid record to back him up, particularly on the agricultural issues which his rural constiuency cares most about.

The Charlotte Observer story broke on October 3. It outlined Jenrette's seven-year relationship with the Heritage Shores development and, in summary, charged that Jenrette had sold land which was under water to unsuspecting buyers and had mortgaged land which the company did not own to the Myrtle Beach Air Force credit union in return for a $340,000 loan — a loan which was not completed secured and which was unprecedented in the credit union's history. Although the Charlotte Observer produced buyers who contradicted him, Jenrette has contended that the purchasers of the property were not "unsuspecting" but were land speculators who hoped to turn a profit when the tidal property was filled in and developed. Jenrette was more evasive on the question of the unowned lots which were mortgaged, attributing the incident to a bookkeeping error. On October 15, the Observer reported that a grand jury had been requested to look into the Heritage Shores affair. The newspaper also reported that the U. S. Department of Housing and Urban Development was examining the financial dealings of the project to determine if interstate land sales laws had been violated. (HUD quickly determined that the laws had been violated in at least one instance — Heritage Shores had failed to register its property with HUD and file the required disclosure statements.)

Jenrette, already burdened by the disclosures, suffered another blow when Young announced on Oct. 14 that a state tax judgement had been filed against his opponent for $1,700 in back taxes.

Jenrette and Democratic party chairman Don Fowler have dismissed the recent furor as part of a "political vendetta." Both pointed out that the federal grand jury investigation was instigated by U. S. Attorney Mark Buyck, Young's 1974 campaign chairman. "Ed Young is dead in the water on the issues," Fowler told a news conference on Oct. 15. "He has done nothing but run an issueless and irresponsible and immoral campaign."

While Buyck's involvement in the Heritage Shores matter does carry the smell of political cronyism, the fact remains that the Observer revealed highly questionable activities on the part of Jenrette which were substantiated by the facts and which Jenrette has been unable to refute. (Readers will note, by the way, that unlike 1972, when Jenrette denied having any significant interest in the development, the congressman now admits to owning the bulk of the company.)

The political question is this: can Jenrette, who appeared to be overwhelming Young prior to the recent scandals, carry this additional burden across the finish line to victory in November? Many political observers believe that he will. Polls in the Sixth District have revealed a substantial margin in favor of presidential candidate Jimmy Carter. This should help Jenrette among those voters who tend to vote a straight party ticket. Jenrette still has strong support in the resort towns along the Horry County shoreline. The Congressman claims the overwhelming majority of the black vote in the Sixth District — a crucial factor since the addition of predominantly black Clarendon County to the District in 1972. Jenrette is also considered strong among the many farmers in the agricultural district, particularly tobacco growers whose cause he has doggedly championed in Congress. Jenrette has all that and more—he's the incumbent, he has the kind of organization only incumbents, with the ability to grant political favors, can build.

Will all this be enough? Only the soothsayers are willing to say. But Jenrette is running scared.

Last week House Speaker-to-be Tip O'Neill was down in the district reassuring voters that Jenrette is an honorable man and an up-and-come in Congress. Whatever happens on November 2, one thing is for sure, Johnny Jenrette's had a tough way to go.

Sizing up the new Senate

by Jim Walser and Brad Stinson

One thing for sure about the State Senate races now in progress across South Carolina — namely, no matter how stunning the results are on Nov. 2, the impact will be less pronounced than what has already happened this year to the foundations of that sometimes august (and frequently blunderbuss) body.

The Democratic Party Primary, increase in the number of circuit judgeships, and retirement of four senators have acted in concert to create what for the Senate amounts to chaos. Personal institutions like Marion County's Ralph Gasque, Horry County's Jim Stevens, Colleton County's Preacher Harrelson and lesser lights Jim Morris and Tom Bowen of Sumter have departed — some in bitterness — after the summer cleaning job accomplished by the June primary.

Taken alone, the ejection of Stevens, Gasque and Harrelson would constitute a major power transfer in the Senate — but that was hardly the extent of the turnover. Veterans Walter Bristow of Columbia, William Ballenger of Oconee County and Spartanburg's Paul Moore — none of whom might be described as hard-core progressives — copped circuit judgeships when the Judicial reform package was signed into law. And four other members — LaNue Floyd, Dick Riley, Travis Medlock and Jimmy Martin — decided against seeking re-election. They are gone as well.

So the version of the Senate that Lt. Governor Brantley Harvey calls to order next January will be a substantially different one than its predecessor — no matter what occurs on Nov. 2. It might not be more progressive, and it might not pass better legislation, but it'll be different.

That is not to demean what will happen on Nov. 2, however, because the form and content of this new Senate are still to be determined, and the general election will contribute mightily on that count.

There are a number of interesting races to be decided on Nov. 2 and we've tried to highlight a few of them here. This isn't comprehensive coverage of the contests, but it should provide an insight into some of the more important matchups that will help shape the character and personality of the new Senate.

DISTRICT EIGHT

Seats One, Two Three and Four

This one's a mess.

The District is huge, incorporating Lexington, Barnwell, Bamberg, Aiken and Edgefield Counties, and the very fact that anyone would run is a testimony to their patience — as well as to their bank account.

It may be the single best argument going for single-member Senate districts, a proposal that has always been discarded as quickly as possible by the old-line Democrats who have run the Senate until now.

"We've spent all our time running up and down the roads in the district, trying to get to as many people personally as we could," says Randy Davis a campaign operative in the District. "But it's awfully spread out. We'd like to have met everyone personally, but it's impossible with 300,000 people in your district."

Yes, it is. But that's the way Messrs. Gressette and Dennis planned, it, and that's the way it will remain until the Senate comes to its collective senses.

Maybe next year.

District Eight, Seat One — Incumbent Republican Gilbert McMillan doesn't like Communists.

Neither, for that matter, does his opponent, social activist - educator Rodney Albert, a black who is the first of his race since Reconstruction to come this close to getting elected to the State Senate. But Albert professes to be more concerned with the social issues directly affecting the thousands of people in the district more than tracking down Commies. "He talks about his opposition to communism," says Albert, "but in the State Senate he has a record as a non-producer. We're talking about the issues like education and jobs for the people of this part of the state. And we think the race is kind of heating up."

At the forefront of his campaign literature, McMillan, a retired industrial manager with DuPont of Aiken and now a tree farmer, emphasizes his fight to "fight communism" and his perfect attendance record in the Senate since 1972. His support will derive directly from his Aiken base, his incumbency, and, quite likely, the fact that he is white.

"We're trying to keep this from being the politics of race," Albert says. "If Democrats in the District go out and vote for the Democrats on the ticket, then I should win. We've got to get the Democratic vote. We're strong among the people of Batesburg, North Augusta, Graniteville and the small towns like Swansea. But we're not planning on the country club vote."

Since blacks who have sought a Senate seat before, like Columbia's Hemphill Pride, have been beaten in the Democratic primary, Albert feels there has been a built-in excuse for those Democrats who voted against blacks. "They could always say they were just voting for the better candidate," said Albert. "But there's no excuse now for them to vote Republican this time around."

If on election day, Jimmy Carter carries District Eight substantially and Rodney Albert loses to Gil McMillan, then the question of race in South Carolina politics will be raised again. But campaign operatives in the area are already predicting a McMillan victory, because of racial considerations and because some feel that his campaign has not been aggressive enough.

District Eight, Seat Two — Another incumbent Republican, Mike Laughlin, is fighting for his political life against former Williston mayor Bill Knotts.

The challenger has run an aggressive, expensive media and issues campaign, emphasizing neo-progressive issues and Laughlin's propensity to "take a walk" anytime key legislation is pending.

Although he is only 32 years old, Laughlin has already served two full terms and was one of the youngest men ever elected to a Senate post. He changed party affiliations before this year's campaign, however, and political observers who foresee a Democratic comeback behind Carter in the District feel that his party change has hurt him. At best the party-change operation is an unknown quantity and tnrows an added dimension into a conservative - moderate race.

"Knotts is no great guns as a progressive," says one campaign worker in the area. "But he'll be better than Laughlin on most issues. And it looks good for Knotts right now."

District Eight. Seat Three — Tom Turnipseed is back, and no one is more aware of it than incumbent Republican A. J. Dooley.

Turnipseed's emotional, aggressive and populist discussion of the issues always makes for an interesting campaign, as was the case two years ago when he opposed veteran incumbent attorney general Dan McLeod and came very close to beating him. Turnipseed is the former national director of the 1968 George Wallace campaign for the presidency (he didn't support Wallace this spring, however), the former executive directing and guiding force behind the S. C. Taxpayer's Assn., currently practicing law in Columbia.

As head of the Taxpayer's Assn., Turnipseed spent most of his time fighting the Dairy Commission, the Public Service Commission, power companies, and lawyers who take retainer fees for practicing for the power companies before the PSC.

His primary culprits this campaign season have been the above-mentioned consumer evils, along with the Senate's archaic seniority system, and Dooley's personal record of accepting a retainer fee from Southern Railway. In order to lend proper emphasis to these issues, Turnipseed has printed 60,000 campaign tabloids for distribution in the District and has taken a number of television ads. (one of which shows a long traffic jam resulting from a train passing through Columbia).

Then there have been the Jimmy Carter campaign themes — trust, hope, and love. "Our government requires honest and trusting people working together for the good of all," Turnipseed says. "I believe people are ready to replace doubt with faith, despair with hope, and division with love. We can govern ourselves!"

On Nov. 2, Turnipseed will discover whether that is the case.

District Eight, Seat Four — This is one of those battles of political newcomers, as Republican Addison "Joe" Wilson and Democrat Nikki Setzler compete in their first political campaigns.

For the most part, choosing between the two is a case of splitting ideological hairs, and whichever candidate is elected, the conservative record of non-running, incumbent Jimmy Martin won't be substantially changed.

Wilson has most likely spent more money on billboards and television, as anyone who has visited Lexington County or watched the tube can vouch for. He is a member of the law firm of Dent, Kirkland, Taylor and Wilson, and enjoys the support by association of traveling with law partner Harry Dent, and working in the campaigns of U. S. Senator Strom Thurmond and Second District Congressman Floyd Spence.

Both Wilson, 29, and Setzler, 31, are young up-and-comers within their parties. Setzler has criticized Wilson for running as part of the District Eight Republican "team" — along with McMillan, Dooley and Laughlin. "We've tried to point out that we won't be controlled by anyone if Nikki gets elected," said Randy Davis, his campaign manager. "Along those lines, we've emphasized his independence in such things as running his law office alone, as opposed to Joe being part of a firm. We've also emphasized Nikki being married and having children, so that he understands what people in that position want." Wilson is not married.

The issue of crime is second in importance to these "independence" questions, according to the Setzler people. "We support stronger penalties for crimes like armed robbery and we want speedier trials for those charged so that cases won't just lay idle." Of course, Wilson wouldn't disagree with that.

Name recognition has been a problem for both newcomers, and the candidate that wins might very well be the one who has done the most effective job of getting his name around. Considering the lack of issue - oriented campaigning, that's probably as good a criterion as anything.

Campbell

Yarborough

DISTRICT TWO

Seat 3

A statewide political career could be on the line in this Greenville-Laurens County race to succeed retiring Senator Richard Riley of Greenville, whom some feel vacated the post in order to devote more time to — that's right, a statewide political career.

The future in question is that of Republican Carroll Campbell, who suffered a bitterly disappointing loss in the lieutenant governor's race in 1974, losing to Brantley Harvey despite the fact that fellow Republican Jim Edwards was capturing the governor's mansion.

So this is a comeback attempt for Campbell, a former member of the House and an early aide to Edwards in the governor's office. Another political defeat at this juncture of his career could stem his political future in terms of statewide potential. On the other hand, a victory, two years in the Senate would leave him in a strong position to challenge for the GOP gubernatorial nomination in 1978. So this one is big for him.

His opponent is another youthful candidate, Greenville County Democratic chairman Dan Yarborough, a Riley protege who is seeking elective office for the first time. He has enunciated most of the positions that Riley did during the past eight years — progressive positions on judicial reform and ethics and an emphasis on increased funds for elementary and secondary education.

Campbell, a moderate Republican, considers his strongest area to be government efficiency and management, including such things as reform within the Department of Social Services and the day-to-day operations of the Senate.

Originally, C ampbell was considered an easy victor in the election, but as Yarborough put it to a voter the other day, "You don't ever know how an election might go."

DISTRICT FOUR

Seat One

If one didn't know better, you'd think that Tom Turnipseed was running in two Senate races this time around.

Because that's his brother David up there in Spartanburg, wailing away at the power companies and the Public Service Commission, sounding an awful lot like brother Tom down in District Eight. And you can bet there'll be plenty of consertnation in certain quarters if not one, but two Turnipseed boys are elected come the morning of Nov. 3.

One of those less than pleased would be David's Republican opponent, Richard Hines, who has made quite a name for himself as a Republican bad boy in the House for the last few years. Now, in a race for the seat vacated when two-termer Paul Moore was elected to a circuit judgeship, Hines is seeking to take his Attila the Hun impersonation to the Senate.

You remember Hines. In addition to fighting the Equal Rights Amendment tooth and nail, he's rigidly, stridently opposed such communistic legislation as Martin Luther King Day and enforcement powers or funding for the state Human Affairs Commission. Then there was the time presidential candidate Frank Church showed up to address a joint session of the House and Senate, and Hines tried to have the chairman of the Senate CIA investigation thrown out for giving away military secrets, treason and a couple of other crimes. House Speaker Rex Carter ruled Hines out of order at the time—but that's usually where Hines stays anyway.

Turnipseed and Moore were law partners before Moore took his judgeship, and Hines' emphasis on that association has "turned it into a double-edged sword," according to Turnipseed. "There's pros and cons. He (Moore) and I don't see eye to eye on a lot of things," said Turnipseed. "But he's a good man and has always been good to me. Hines is attacking Judge Moore and he's made the statement publicly that Moore wasn't qualified to be a judge."

Although this is his first foray into elective politics, the Turnipseeds have always been interested in that field of endeavor. "I think I set the issues for the campaign in my primary election," said Turnipseed the other day. "We've talked about the education first and then about the things like the seniority system and the make-up of the Dairy Commission and the Public Service Commission." Turnipseed, running on those issues, upset former Spartanburg Mayor Robert Stoddard in the Aug. 31 special primary.

"He's (Hines) has spent a lot of money on television, at least $2,000 more than I have," said Turnipseed. "He's from a wealthy family and has the support of big management like Roger Milliken (president of Deering-Milliken). But we feel like we're substantially ahead right now. We feel like local Democrats are going to run ahead of Carter in this District and we think Carter will do very well."

If so, that's good news for Turnipseed, bad news for Hines.

DISTRICT 16

Seat 3

Dewey Wise has completed only one term in the Senate, but has developed a reputation as a hard-working, progressive-minded politician. Although he is included among the reform-minded, he is also a loner, working within what he considers the political realities of the present Senate. He has been quoted as saying that he is "tired of tilting at windmills."

Challenger Nancy Hawk brings to her second political outing a flavor much like the line offered by Governor Edwards: basically, a wait-and-see attitude on issues, and a tight pocketbook. They have more in common than their hometowns, so much so that Gov. Jim took it on himself to endorse Hawk via television commercials during her first political skirmish for the Mayor's seat in Charleston against eventual winner Joe Riley, Jr. She essentially comes across as a "good old boy" in a woman's body.

Hawk

Wise was noted especially during the first two years of his four-year term as a strong advocate of tidelands and ethics legislation. With his support and leadership (at least some of the time) the General Assembly passed ethics legislation for the first time.

Although the ethics law is essentially a watered-down version of what started out as a strong piece of legislation, Wise believes that a bill in the hand is worth two in the bush, that some bill is better than no bill at all. He has taken much the same attitude on tidelands proposals.

He took what many saw as a leadership role in environmental protection in his first couple of years in the Senate chamber and continues to be listed as one of the "Clean Dozen" (a name given to a group of legislators considered by environmentalists to be most environmentally aware).

Hawk is strong on neither issue. Although she would support bills in both areas, she is lacking, for the most part, on specifics. She is critical of ethics legislation in the sense that she doesn't believe that a law can be a cure-all for ethics abuses. She says that plenty of unethical things are done that are completely legal under the law and that the best defense against ethics abuses lies in voter attention to the quality of the candidates they elect.

Hawk would back some kind of legislation, but she takes her cue on protection of the coastlines from Edwards. She, like the governor, is deferential to the rights of property owners and is wary of state control of these delicate areas. She believes that individuals can be just as effective in controlling the areas and feels that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has done a sufficient job in protecting the marshlands, at least in her District.

In the area of education, Hawk has been very vocal, but does not support the 16 per cent across the board increase requested by teachers, unless the money were readily available. Wise, on the other hand, has been a strong supporter of teacher pay increases, and he has won the endorsement of the S.C. Education Association for his stand. Hawk recommends that before any money is spent on education that a legislative study be conducted to determine exactly where funds are most needed.

While Hawk views herself as an advocate of women's rights, she has opposed the Equal Rights Amendment. She believes that discrimination against women can be controlled by laws rather than a constitutional amendment, which she says would open a floodgate of law disputes.

Wise has supported the ERA throughout his term and many of the early volunteers to his campaign joined as a result of his stand on the amendment.

While Wise has been charged, by at least some progressive political observers, with having backed off from the strong leadership role that he exhibited in the first years of his term, there is little doubt that they would much prefer Wise to his opponent.

DISTRICT 16

Seat One

Another Senate race down around the "Holy City" that stacks up as a provocative one is the second race in less than two years between Democratic incumbent Arnold Goodstein and Republican Arthur Ravenel, Jr. The two competed a year and a half ago, if you remember, when the seat was vacated by Jim Edwards after he won the election as governor.

Goodstein has a reputation as a hard campaigner and for not taking any election for granted, and you can bet that this race will be no exception. Goodstein, who has feelers out for the possibility of a statewide candidacy in case Attorney General Dan McLeod decides to retire after his present term, has everything to lose in this race.

Ravenel, the multi-time Republican loser, is fast becoming the John Bolt Culbertson of the low-country. But the fact that Goodstein won a comfortable victory over him so short a time ago doesn't seem to dampen his spirits, and at least some observers in that area believe that this race may be closer than the last.

If you had to pick a winner in this race you would still have to go with "Arnie". Ravenel's image has not been enhanced by his losses nor has he been able to put together an effective campaign organization.

Although Goodstein has turned off many voters with his outgoing personality, he is still the better of the two campaigners, and accomplished at using the media to his advantage. In addition he has strong labor support, and solid backing among black voters. (This was true even two years ago when he defeated black primary challenger George Payton.) Although Goodstein may have raised questions with some backers, by his endorsement of old-guard Sen. James P. Stevens in Stevens' recent primary defeat, voters around Charleston aren't likely to hold that against him, certainly not enough to cost him the election.

market will be like next month, in case you haven't found anything you want. Hence in the best of circumstances, you must search in the dark.

Now economists consider the stock market to be, for all intents and purposes, a "perfect" market, one in which all relevant information is immediately available to all buyers and sellers. Each minute's change in a stock's price is transmitted through the nation electronically, to brokers' offices and even over cable television channels into homes. Complete listings of market activities can be had in the daily newspaper and a half-dozen financial periodicals. One is apprised of demand and supply conditions to the maximum extent.

Would that local real estate markets were privy to such a system. If some central information-gathering agency or firm acted as a clearing house for a city, offering free computerized lists of apartments and houses, cross-classified by qualities sought, then both buyers and sellers would be in the best positions to make wise decisions. But such a system would strip landlords of their secret weapon—consumer ignorance—and rental prices would likely drop, at least for the places that now charge inflated rents. (Yes, there are firms which purport to offer this kind of service. But these are monstrous ripoffs. More about them later.)

One's home affects the flavor of one's life. But acquiring the right home is, under present conditions, a matter of luck, a toss of the dice.
